DISCUSSION: The waiver application was denied by the District Director, Mexico City, Mexico, and is now before the Administrative Appeals Office (AAO) on appeal. The appeal will be dismissed.

The applicant is a native and citizen of Mexico. The record indicates that the applicant was found to be inadmissible under section 212(a)(6)(C)(i) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (the Act), 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(6)(C)(i), for having attempted to procure entry into the United States by fraud and/or willful misrepresentation. The applicant seeks a waiver of inadmissibility pursuant to section 212(i) of the Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1182(i), in order to reside in the United States with her U.S. Citizen spouse and children.

The director noted that the applicant sought to enter the United States by presenting a border-crossing card of another person. The director also noted that the applicant failed to submit evidence of extreme hardship. The director determined that extreme hardship to a qualifying relative had not been established and denied the Application for Waiver of Grounds of Inadmissibility (Form I-601) accordingly. Decision of the District Director, dated September 20, 2007.

In support of the appeal, the applicant's spouse submits a declaration and additional documents. The entire record was reviewed and considered in rendering a decision on the appeal. The applicant's husband contends that the applicant never misrepresented her true identity and after each entry the applicant always returned to Mexico within the time permitted. See statement in support of appeal.

The record reflects that the applicant was issued a multiple-entry border crossing card on September 14, 1995. At that time the applicant was unmarried and the border crossing card was issued in her maiden name. During the period from September 14, 1995 to September 20, 1998, the applicant made multiple entries into the United States using the border crossing card. Following her entry on July 4, 1996, the applicant married her husband in California on July 7, 1996. On April 10, 1997 the applicant's husband filed a Form I-130 on behalf of the applicant. The Form I-130 was approved on June 24, 1997. The applicant continued to use the border crossing card until September 20, 1998, when she was denied entry into the United States. The applicant has not attempted to enter the United States since September 20, 1998.

The record reflects that the applicant's border crossing card was cancelled on September 20, 1998 for a violation of section 212(a)(6)(C) of the Act. In addition, at her consular interview, the applicant admitted to lying to an immigration officer. The applicant is, therefore, inadmissible pursuant to section 212(a)(6)(C)(i) of the Act for misrepresenting a material fact.

Section 212(i) of the Act provides, in pertinent part:

- (1) The Attorney General [now the Secretary of Homeland Security (Secretary)] may, in the discretion of the Attorney General [Secretary], waive the application of clause (i) of subsection (a)(6)(C) in the case of an alien who is the spouse, son or daughter of a United States citizen or of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, if it is established to the satisfaction of the Attorney General [Secretary] that the refusal of admission to the United States of such immigrant alien would result in extreme hardship to the citizen or lawfully resident spouse or parent of such an alien.

A waiver of inadmissibility under section 212(i) of the Act is dependent on a showing that the bar to admission imposes extreme hardship on a qualifying relative, which includes the U.S. citizen or lawfully resident spouse or parent of the applicant. Hardship to the applicant or her children can be considered only insofar as it results in hardship to a qualifying relative. The applicant's husband is the only qualifying relative in this case. If extreme hardship to a qualifying relative is established, the applicant is statutorily eligible for a waiver, and USCIS then assesses whether a favorable exercise of discretion is warranted. See Matter of Mendez-Moralez, 21 I&N Dec. 296, 301 (BIA 1996).

As a qualifying relative is not required to depart the United States as a consequence of an applicant's inadmissibility, two distinct factual scenarios exist should a waiver application be denied: either the qualifying relative will join the applicant to reside abroad or the qualifying relative will remain in the United States. Ascertaining the actual course of action that will be taken is complicated by the fact that an applicant may easily assert a plan for the qualifying relative to relocate abroad or to remain in the United States depending on which scenario presents the greatest prospective hardship, even though no intention exists to carry out the alleged plan in reality. Cf. Matter of Ige, 20 I&N Dec. 880, 885 (BIA 1994) (addressing separation of minor child from both parents applying for suspension of deportation). Thus, we interpret the statutory language of the various waiver provisions in section 212 of the Act to require an applicant to establish extreme hardship to his or her qualifying relative(s) under both possible scenarios. To endure the hardship of separation when extreme hardship could be avoided by joining the applicant abroad, or to endure the hardship of relocation when extreme hardship could be avoided by remaining in the United States, is a matter of choice and not the result of removal or inadmissibility. As the Board of Immigration Appeals stated in Matter of Ige:

[W]e consider the critical issue . . . to be whether a child would suffer extreme hardship if he accompanied his parent abroad. If, as in this case, no hardship would ensue, then the fact that the child might face hardship if left in the United States would be the result of parental choice, not the parent's deportation.

Id. See also Matter of Pilch, 21 I&N Dec. 627, 632-33 (BIA 1996)

Extreme hardship is "not a definable term of fixed and inflexible content or meaning," but "necessarily depends upon the facts and circumstances peculiar to each case." Matter of Hwang, 10 I&N Dec. 448, 451 (BIA 1964). In Matter of Cervantes-Gonzalez, the Board provided a list of factors it deemed relevant in determining whether an alien has established extreme hardship to a qualifying relative. 22 I&N Dec. 560, 565 (BIA 1999). The factors include the presence of a lawful permanent resident or United States citizen spouse or parent in this country; the qualifying relative's family ties outside the United States; the conditions in the country or countries to which the qualifying relative would relocate and the extent of the qualifying relative's ties in such countries; the financial impact of departure from this country; and significant conditions of health, particularly when tied to an unavailability of suitable medical care in the country to which the qualifying relative would relocate.

Id. The Board added that not all of the foregoing factors need be analyzed in any given case and emphasized that the list of factors was not exclusive. Id. at 566.

The Board has also held that the common or typical results of deportation, removal and inadmissibility do not constitute extreme hardship, and has listed certain individual hardship factors considered common rather than extreme. These factors include: economic disadvantage, loss of current employment, inability to maintain one's present standard of living, inability to pursue a chosen profession, separation from family members, severing community ties, cultural readjustment after living in the United States for many years, cultural adjustment of qualifying relatives who have never lived outside the United States, inferior economic and educational opportunities in the foreign country, or inferior medical facilities in the foreign country. See generally Matter of Cervantes-Gonzalez, 22 I&N Dec. at 568; Matter of Pilch, 21 I&N Dec. at 631-32; Matter of Ige, 20 I&N Dec. at 883; Matter of Ngai, 19 I&N Dec. 245, 246-47 (Comm'r 1984); Matter of Kim, 15 I&N Dec. 88, 89-90 (BIA 1974); Matter of Shaughnessy, 12 I&N Dec. 810, 813 (BIA 1968).

However, though hardships may not be extreme when considered abstractly or individually, the Board has made it clear that "[r]elevant factors, though not extreme in themselves, must be considered in the aggregate in determining whether extreme hardship exists." Matter of O-J-O, 21 I&N Dec. 381, 383 (BIA 1996) (quoting Matter of Ige, 20 I&N Dec. at 882). The adjudicator "must consider the entire range of factors concerning hardship in their totality and determine whether the combination of hardships takes the case beyond those hardships ordinarily associated with deportation." Id.

We observe that the actual hardship associated with an abstract hardship factor such as family separation, economic disadvantage, cultural readjustment, et cetera, differs in nature and severity depending on the unique circumstances of each case, as does the cumulative hardship a qualifying relative experiences as a result of aggregated individual hardships. See, e.g., In re Bing Chih Kao and Mei Tsui Lin, 23 I&N Dec. 45, 51 (BIA 2001) (distinguishing Matter of Pilch regarding hardship faced by qualifying relatives on the basis of variations in the length of residence in the United States and the ability to speak the language of the country to which they would relocate).

Family separation, for instance, has been found to be a common result of inadmissibility or removal in some cases. See Matter of Shaughnessy, 12 I&N Dec. at 813. Nevertheless, family ties are to be considered in analyzing hardship. See Matter of Cervantes-Gonzalez, 22 I&N Dec. at 565-66. The question of whether family separation is the ordinary result of inadmissibility or removal may depend on the nature of family relationship considered. For example, in Matter of Shaughnessy, the Board considered the scenario of parents being separated from their soon-to-be adult son, finding that this separation would not result in extreme hardship to the parents. Id. at 811-12; see also U.S. v. Arrieta, 224 F.3d 1076, 1082 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Mr. Arrieta was not a spouse, but a son and brother. It was evident from the record that the effect of the deportation order would be separation rather than relocation."). In Matter of Cervantes-Gonzalez, the Board considered the scenario of the respondent's spouse accompanying him to Mexico, finding that she would not experience extreme hardship from losing "physical proximity to her family" in the United States. 22 I&N Dec. at 566-67.

The decision in Cervantes-Gonzalez reflects the norm that spouses reside with one another and establish a life together such that separating from one another is likely to result in substantial hardship. It is common for both spouses to relocate abroad if one of them is not allowed to stay in the United States, which typically results in separation from other family members living in the United States. Other decisions reflect the expectation that minor children will remain with their parents, upon whom they usually depend for financial and emotional support. See, e.g., Matter of Ige, 20 I&N Dec. at 886 (“[I]t is generally preferable for children to be brought up by their parents.”). Therefore, the most important single hardship factor may be separation, particularly where spouses and minor children are concerned. Salcido-Salcido, 138 F.3d at 1293 (quoting Contreras-Buenfil v. INS, 712 F.2d 401, 403 (9th Cir. 1983)); Cerrillo-Perez, 809 F.2d at 1422.

Regardless of the type of family relationship involved, the hardship resulting from family separation is determined based on the actual impact of separation on an applicant, and all hardships must be considered in determining whether the combination of hardships takes the case beyond the consequences ordinarily associated with removal or inadmissibility. Matter of O-J-O, 21 I&N Dec. at 383. Nevertheless, though we require an applicant to show that a qualifying relative would experience extreme hardship both in the event of relocation and in the event of separation, in analyzing the latter scenario, we give considerable, if not predominant, weight to the hardship of separation itself, particularly in cases involving the separation of spouses from one another and/or minor children from a parent. Salcido-Salcido, 138 F.3d at 1293.

The applicant does not establish extreme hardship to her husband if he remains in the United States. In his letter, the applicant’s husband states that it is difficult for him to maintain two households; and to work and travel to Mexico to visit his wife and children. However, the applicant does not provide evidence of the family’s income and expenses. The applicant’s husband does not indicate whether the applicant is employed in Mexico and what her earnings are, nor does he specify the household bills for their home in the United States, and the expenses he will incur to maintain a separate household in Mexico. Without details of the family’s income and expenses, the AAO is unable to assess the nature and extent of financial hardship, if any, the family will face. It is noted that the record fails to demonstrate that the applicant will be unable to contribute to her family’s financial wellbeing from a location outside of the United States.

The applicant’s spouse also states that the nine years of separation from his wife “have been a continuing nightmare which is becoming evermore unbearable,” and that on occasion when his son is ill he has to drive a distance of over 150 miles to his wife’s home in Mexico to visit and be with the child or to take the child back to the United States for treatment, and it is “more unbearable” when he has to deal with “family emergencies” and he cannot drive to Mexico; that “It has been torture to hear [his] sick child in the background while [his] wife cried over the telephone;” and, “The Feelings of Helplessness and Hopelessness are too much to bear.” It is noted that except for a report from his child’s school indicating that his child shows signs of hyperactivity, the applicant’s spouse does not provide a medical report of the nature of the illness his child suffers, nor does he indicate how frequently he has to deal with “family emergencies.” The AAO, therefore, cannot evaluate the emotional harm the applicant would suffer as a result of separation. It is also noted, however, that these consequences are typical of families who are separated and do not establish extreme emotional hardship.

The AAO finds, therefore, that the applicant failed to establish that her husband would suffer extreme hardship if he remains in the United States.

The applicant's spouse states that relocating to Mexico would result in extreme hardship because since 1981, at age 14, he has been living in the United States and has been employed here for over 20 years; and, that "it pains him to see [his children] forced to grow up in a foreign country with poor educational and medical facilities." The applicant's spouse, however, does not provide details of the living conditions he and his family would face in Mexico, the nature and extent of difficulty he will have making a cultural adjustment, and his prospects of gaining employment in Mexico, if he joins them there. The AAO, therefore, is unable to determine whether the hardship claimed will be beyond what would normally be experienced by families who relocate as a result of an applicant's inadmissibility. Therefore, the applicant has failed to establish extreme hardship to her husband if he joins her in Mexico.

A review of the documentation in the record fails to establish the existence of extreme hardship to the applicant's spouse caused by the applicant's inadmissibility to the United States. Having found the applicant statutorily ineligible for relief, no purpose would be served in discussing whether she merits a waiver as a matter of discretion.

In proceedings for application for waiver of grounds of inadmissibility under section 212(i) of the Act, the burden of proving eligibility remains entirely with the applicant. See section 291 of the Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1361. Here, the applicant has not met that burden. Accordingly, the appeal will be dismissed.

ORDER: The appeal is dismissed.
